There are two types of accounting. These are cost accounting and accrual accounting. Accrual accounting is the accounting method identifies the economic events when they take, regardless of when the cash is exchanged. This type accounting method is used to recognize the position and performance of any company. It measures the performance by identifying the economic events which is regardless of cash transaction occurrences. Here the economic events are identified by matching the revenues to the expenses at the time in which the transactions occur rather than the time of payment made or received. Most companies consider accrual accounting method to be a standard accounting method. Accrual accounting method allows the current cash flow (inflow and outflow) to be combined with the future expected cash flows (inflows and outflows) in order to provide a detailed and an accurate image of the present financial position of any company. Accrual accounting is just opposite of the cash accounting. Cash accounting recognizes the financial transactions only if the cash exchange takes place, while the accrual accounting recognizes regardless of cash exchange. This is based on the accrual principle. Under it the revenue is recorded, when it is earned. Expenses are recorded when incurred. While preparing the financial statements for external users, it conforms to GAAP provisions. It is employed by many companies. Some small companies use cash basis accounting.

The expenses are matched with the revenues on the income statement. In the US, the accrual basis of accounting has been used since 1916. Due to the increasing business transaction complexities and the need of highly accurate financial information, this accounting method was created. For example, a firm sells a computer to a customer who has credit card. Here the accrual method and cash method will look at the event in different ways. The revenue which is generated on the sale of the computer is only identified by the cash method if the money is received by the firm. According to accrual accounting, cash method is not accurate. In the cash method, as the sale has been made, the company receives the cash in the future. While accrual accounting method identifies the sale of the computer at point at which the customer takes the ownership of the computer. The sale is booked to accounts receivable, even though the cash isn't yet in the bank.
